

TWIMC

The traffic and weather information provided by XM Radio is based on technology provided by a service provider called "Traffic Pulse". This service is primarily web-based, but can be adapted to cable and radio outlets. There is no difference between paying for this service on the internet or paying for it with my subscription to XM radio. There are countless websites that provide local information to a nationwide subscription base (Zagats, CitySearch, Yahoo, for example). Will these also come under attack? Do they offer unfair competition to local style sections? Additionally, this is a service that local radio stations cannot provide: continuous weather and traffic every five minutes. Well, my feelings are pretty clear on the matter. The rest is up to you.

Sincerely

J Jason Huber
